Ethnomethodology is the latest development in sociological theory. It appeared during the second half of 20th Century as a revolt against traditional theories which sought to explain social systems and individualistic ideologies. Historically, it is a reaction against the theories of Functionalism, Exchange and Interactionism. Harold Garfinkel defined ethnomethodology as "an organised study of the individual's knowledge of his ordinary affairs, of his own organised enterprises, where that knowledge is treated as part of the same setting that makes it orderable." According to William J. Goode, "Ethnomethodology is a study of the social rules or regularities by which people construct the social reality they interact with and inhabit."

Ethnomethodology visualises a new theory of social order based on individual's personal experiences. It rejects the preconceived ideas of social order and individual action propounded by Functionalism and Exchange. Functionalism stresses the importance of structured social relations and social actions. Exchange theory imposes a narrow concept of social action. Interactionism emphasises the importance of actors in social life. As against these theories, Ethnomethodology is a radical break from traditional assumptions of structured relations and individuality. Ethnomethodology is a perspective. But, it is not a deductive or pattern theory as found in other perspectives. It does mean that there is no social order. It considers social order as a created and sustained derivation from social interaction. But, what is most important is individual's routine experience rather
