biosensors may utilize enzymes antibodies nucleic acids organelles plant and animal tissue whole organism or organs Biosensors containing biological catalysts enzymes are called catalytical biosensors These type of biosensors are the most abundant and they found the largest application in medicine ecology and environmental monitoring The action of catalytical biosensors is associated with substrate diffusion into biocatalytical membrane and its conversion to a product The modeling of biosensors involves solving the diffusion equations for substrate and product with a term containing a rate of biocatalytical transformation of substrate The complications of modeling arise due to solving of partially differential equations with non linear biocatalytical term and with complex boundary and initial conditions The book starts with the modeling biosensors by analytical solution of partial differential equations Historically this method was used to describe fundamental features of biosensors action though it is limited by substrate concentration and is applicable for simple biocatalytical processes Using this method the action of biosensors was analyzed at critical concentrations of substrate and enzyme activity Practical
