

Introduction to Science, Technology and Society

Definition of Terms

Science- the word came from the Latin "scientia," meaning "knowledge." It refers to the systematic and methodical activity of building and organizing knowledge about how the universe behaves through observation, experimentation, or both.

According to famous American science historian, John Heilbron (2003), "Modern science is a discovery of regularity in nature, enough for natural phenomena to be described by principles and laws. he also explained that science required invention to devise techniques, abstractions, apparatuses, and organizations to describe these natural regularities and their law-like descriptions.

Technology- it is the application of scientific knowledge, laws, and principles to produce services, materials, tools, and machines aimed at solving real-world problems. It came from the Greek word techne, meaning 'art, skill, or cunning of hand.'

Society- is composed of a group of people living together in a more or less ordered community.

Wolpert (2005) made an interesting comparison between science and technology that is helpful in the study of their interaction with society. Wolpert explained that reliable scientific knowledge has no moral or ethical value. It is meant simply to explain how nature and the universe work and that the obligation of the scientists, besides studying the nature of the universe, is to explain the possible uses and applications of such scientific knowledge. Along this line, Wolpert made it clear that science is not the same as technology. Scientists are not responsible for the application of knowledge in technology. He further explained that the very nature of science is that it is not possible to predict scientific discoveries and how these discoveries may be applied. While scientists are not responsible for the reliable conduct of the scientific inquiry and its honest interpretation and dissemination, technological applications of science are influenced by other sectors such as politics and governance, religion, and business.

Nowadays, advancements in science and technology have become pervasive. They are manifested in the activities that humans pursue and the tools they use every day. The beauty of this is that an advancement builds upon itself. As such, humans today live more productive and more exciting lives than their predecessors.

However, the dynamism and immensity of scientific and technological progress also pose challenges and drawbacks to the way humans live. The introduction of machines
