Signal To Syntax Bootstrapping From Speech To Grammar In Early Acquisition:

Signal to Syntax James L. Morgan, Katherine Demuth, 2014-01-14 In the beginning before there are words or syntax or discourse there is speech Speech is an infant's gateway to language Without exposure to speech no language or at most only a feeble facsimile of language develops regardless of how rich a child's biological endowment for language learning may be But little is given directly in speech not words for example as anyone who has ever listened to fluent conversation in an unfamiliar language can attest Rather words and phrases or rudimentary categories or whatever other information is required for syntactic and semantic analyses to begin operating must be pulled from speech through an infant's developing perceptual capacities By the end of the first year an infant can segment at least some words from fluent speech Beyond this how impoverished or rich an infant's representations of input may be remains largely unknown Clearly in the debate over determinants of early language acquisition the input speech stream has too often been offhandedly dismissed as a potential source of information This volume brings together internationally known scholars from a range of disciplines linguistics psychology cognitive and computer science and acoustics who share common interests in how speech in its phonological prosodic distributional and statistical properties may encode information useful for early language learning and how such information may be deciphered by very young children These scholars offer a spectrum of viewpoints on the possibility that aspects of speech may provide bootstraps for language learning contribute important state of the art findings across a variety of relevant domains and illuminate critical directions for future inquiry The publication of this volume represents a significant step in renewing the bonds between two fields that have long been sundered speech perception and language acquisition dissertation addresses the second language L2 acquisition of word stress in production and perception from both a phonological theoretical and psycholinguistic angle It investigates how cross linguistic differences in the types of metrical systems of native speakers of a variety of first native languages L1 affect the L2 acquisition of word stress This includes the differences in the formal properties of L1 and L2 stress and the functional properties of L1 stress and their implications for the representation of stress in the mental lexicon established during the L1 acquisition process To this end native speakers of several languages were tested experimentally for their L2 perception and production of Polish word stress These languages were Russian lexical accent system all positions in a word possible German English Spanish Italian in all stress within a three syllable window at the right edge of the word Czech fixed word initial stress French phrase final stress and Chinese tone
