Davey,1979 Intercultural Competence in Instructed Language Learning Paula Garrett-Rucks,2016-03-01

There is pressure on world language educators to prepare learners with 21st century skills to meet the challenges of an increasingly interconnected globalized world The need for change was summarized in the 2007 report of the MLA Ad Hoc Committee on Foreign Languages that suggested the implementation of curricular reform by developing students translingual and transcultural competence p 3 which allows someone to operate between languages p 237 However the integration of such a meaningful cultural component in instructed language learning is a complex topic This book recognizes the difficulty world language educators face to achieve the goals of the MLA report particularly at beginning levels of instruction in target language use classrooms Accordingly this book informs instructed language learning and teaching by bridging developmental theories from the fields of intercultural competence with second language pedagogies particularly communicative language teaching CLT and literacy based approaches providing examples of practical applications inside the classroom and beyond It is intended to support the many FL educators who have consistently reported that they are struggling to incorporate meaningful cultural instruction into their practice Fox Phillips Sercu 2005 This book provides a framework to foster learners deep cultural reflection at beginning levels of instruction while preserving target language use policies bridging CLT pedagogies to intercultural communicative competence ICC literacy based approaches It starts by synthesizing prominent definitions of culture and culture learning models and then summarizes disparate sources of research findings on culture learning projects which primarily take place at advanced levels of language learning to the Standards based classroom at all levels of instruction K 16 Although research on fostering learners intercultural competence at beginning levels of language instruction is in its infancy it is of utmost concern given that the vast majority of U S language learners rarely continue to advanced levels of instruction Zimmer Lowe 2008 In addition this book challenges FL educators to advocate for their FL programs and to give greater visibility and credibility to the profession in institutional internationalization efforts The theoretical components of this book deconstruct the connections between language thought and culture and problematize developmental models in the IC field that neglect to consider the important role of language This book provides K 16 FL educators with the discourse needed to 1 explain to administrators parents and students how world language study prepares learners to compete in an increasingly global market beyond the learner s development of linguistic proficiency and 2 convince administrators of the value in and the need for world language study in order to support institutional internationalization efforts The last chapter of this book provides guidance and suggestions on ways to expand K 12 teacher preparation programs and continuing education training to foster learners intercultural communicative competence while preserv ing a Standards based curriculum In sum this book is intended to 1 support all K 16 world language educa tors with their program advocacy and instruction 2 serve as a reference manual or course book in teacher preparation programs 3 serve as a reference manual or course book for research and graduate courses on the teaching and learning of languages
