Pioneers of Reform Dorothy Catherine Johnson,1929 A Male Hysteria Edward Beasley,2024-07-30 A history of diabetes science and the experience of diabetics in the nineteenth century England A Male Hysteria examines both the science of diabetes in nineteenth century England and the testimony of Victorian diabetics What could be known about diabetes given the science of the day And what did new models of diabetes mean for the treatment and self image of diabetics Ideas about diabetes were revolutionized in 1849 by the great French physiologist Claude Bernard After he made rabbits diabetic by pricking their brains diabetes in England came to be thought of as neurological even psychological in origin British diabetics often men were prevented from working or becoming excited treated in the same manner as women who were diagnosed with hysteria Meanwhile discoveries in thermodynamics were applied to diabetics and menstruating women People were assumed to be closed systems wasting energy that couldn t be replenished Thus diabetics had to stay still if they wanted to live and women had to stay away from education to have the energy to produce children Some people resisted these hysterical views As no brain lesion was ever found in deceased diabetics even after decades of searching the animal model of the disease no longer seemed to apply to humans Some diabetic patients also resisted the hysterical picture including medical professionals both men and women who refused to slow down as the new treatment regimen was mandated Likewise physicians at spas noted that walking long distances seemed to help diabetics A Male Hysteria journeys through nineteenth century diabetes science and the lives of diabetics It examines how science can go wrong when models from one area of inquiry are too excitedly applied to another It also demonstrates the persistence of the psychological stereotype of diabetics as nervous and overworked in the United Kingdom long after medical attention turned to the pancreas and the role of insulin Pioneers of reform Dorothy C.
