Schooling and Scholars in Nineteenth-century Ontario Susan E. Houston, Alison L. Prentice, 1988-01-01 Nineteenth century educational reformers were fond of an agricultural metaphor when it came to the provision of more and better schooling even good land they argued had to be cultivated othersie noxious weeds sprang up In this study of education in Ontario from the establishment of Upper Canada to the end of Egerton Ryerson s career as chief superintendent of schools in 1876 Susan Houston and Alison Prentice explore the roots of the provincial public school system set up to instill a work ethic and moral discipline appropriate to the new society as well as the beginnings of separate schools today the Ontario school system is once again the subject of intense and often bitter debate Many of the most contentious issues have deep and complex roots that go back to this era Houston and Prentice tell the story of how Ontario came to have a universal school system of exceptional quality and shed valuable light on an area of current concern Archivaria ,1987

Canadiana ,1981 Labouring Lives Paul Craven, 1995 For twenty years labour and working class history has emphasized the struggle for workplace control between skilled craftsmen and factory owners in Ontario s major industrial cities This preoccupation not only has left the great majority of the province s working people in the shadows of history but has isolated labour history from such other new histories as women s history ethnic history and the history of mobility This collaborative volume argues for a more nuanced account of the diversity of working people's experience in the nineteenth century. It presents detailed studies of a broad range of occupations and institutions that figured prominently in workers' lives. These include the more common jobs: farm labour, housework, lumbering, and the more pervasive institutions: the church, the law, the family, as well as new accounts of industrial labour in small town factories and on the railways. The themes explored include class formation, the nature and meaning of work, labour relations, and the character of economic and social change in nineteenth century Ontario. Drawing on a wide range of international scholarship in feminist theory, women's and gender history, and cultural studies, Cecilia Morgan analyses political and religious languages in the Upper Canadian press, both secular and religious, and other material published in the colony from the 1790s to the 1850s. She examines constructs and concepts of gender in a wide number of areas: narratives of the War of 1812, political struggles over responsible government in the 1820s and 1830s, evangelical religious discourses throughout these decades, and related discussions of manners and moral behaviour. She also considers the relations between religion and politics in the 1840s, pointing to the continuous struggles of Upper Canadians to define and fix the meanings of public and private and their use of masculinity and femininity to signify these realms. She suggests, as well, that scholars of gender and colonial history need to consider a more nuanced way of understanding social formation in the colony through an examination of the representation of voluntary organizations. The book also examines relations of gender, class, and race as they affected the cultural development of the middle class. Morgan concludes that while seemingly hegemonic definitions of gender relations emerged over this period, with men and masculinity identified with politics and loyalty to the colonial state and imperial connection, and women and femininity linked to the home, the meanings of gender and gendered imagery differed according to their contexts. Colonial society's attempts to make sharp delineations between the public and the private were rarely successful and were marked by numerous tensions and contradictions.
