The Nature of Black Business Development

THE American capitalist system is based on ownership. It may be ownership of a house, a business organization, stocks in a corporation, or what-not. For most Americans, when given a choice of power, of control over one's destiny, through, in ownership of a business enterprise. From the beginning of the nation this desire for ownership has been a salient feature of the American character in life. However mythical the Horatio Alger legend may be, it clearly points up a belief which plays on the American's ambivalence. A few poor farms have moved to the city and the Industrial Revolution signposts of industry. To the west they went like the pioneers; the social upheaval which businessmen saw in New England in Northwesterly North, a Transcendental, and upper middle class upper class. The myth, however, gave hope to many Americans whose position they could not see. "If that man made it from so lowly a beginning, then I too, can do it." Even if success were not phenomenal, surely the ownership of even a small or part-time owned business was achievement in itself.

This need for positive results through business ownership permeates the whole American society and is not limited to white Americans. As a matter of fact, ownership may at this period hold even greater meaning for black Americans. Many would, however, strongly disagree with this statement; some because they would consider it insensitive and others because it perpetuates a myth. E. Franklin Frazier clearly articulated the latter view about those in black hope of black Americans achieving liberation from their low economic position through business ownership. Frazier wrote us " . . . there have been ideas concerning the importance of Negro business have become a social myth and have this myth has been propagated
