MIGHTY MOUTH

Most rays and skates feed on bottom-dwelling fishes and shellfishes. Not the manta ray, though, which swims through surface waters feeding on plankton, just as the large, filter-feeding sharks do. Fleishy lobes (extensions of the pectoral fins) on either side of the manta ray's mouth filter plankton inside. It then uses the spongy gillrakers, attached to the inside of its gill slits, to filter the food from the water. These stingless rays are completely harmless to humans.

Fully grown manta rays may reach 22 feet (6.7 m) from fin to fin.

Skates and rays use their pectoral fins to propel themselves forward, while a shark uses its tail to move through the water.

g Encounter

studying the sponges and sea of the La Jolla Submarine Canyon, I was measuring a sponge when something barely grazed my head. A bon. I thought with annoyance, and thrust my pole up and back without looking. Suddenly, zap! My whole body went rigid with shock. I looked up and saw an electric torpedo ray as big as a trash-can lid cruising above me. Now, I always look before I prod."

Shagreened ribbed skin. One small ray, but not a shark. Manta ray.

Word Builders

Chimaeras get their name for their strange appearance. In Greek mythology, the Chimera was a fire-breathing monster with a lion's head, a goat's body and a serpent's tail. These weird-looking chimaeras even have strange names, including spookfish and goblin.

Fleishy lobes called aliphatic fins guide plankton into the ray's mouth.

Plankton is the collective word for tiny plants, crabs, shrimps, eggs, baby fishes, and the young of many sea animals that drift in currents.

A manta breaches in through its mouth, but breathes out through gill slits.

That's Amazing!

- Electric rays have special muscle cells in the center of both pectoral fins that form a batterylike electric organ. An Atlantic torpedo ray can discharge 220 volts of electricity. That's about twice the voltage used in the average household—and enough to knock out a diver.
- The whitespotted guitarfish is known for its curiosity. It will even prop itself up on the tips of its pectoral fins to get a better look at a diver on the seafloor.

LOOPING THE LOOP

A manta ray can filter feed constantly by looping through a cloud of plankton. If the manta swims straight through, it would waste time turning around in water that contained no food.

Manta Rays

Some ray species, such as the manta ray, live in the warm and shallow waters of the tropics. Many rays live in the deep ocean. Rays like the manta ray have a small mouth and use their pectoral fins to filter out the small organisms on which they feed.
