Panda Kent Eldon Seamons, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. Department of Computer Science, 1996 Abstract Multidimensional arrays are a fundamental data type in scientific computing and are used extensively across a broad range of applications Often these arrays are persistent i e they outlive the invocation of the program that created them Portability and performance with respect to input and output i o pose significant challenges to applications accessing large persistent arrays especially in distributed memory environments A significant number of scientific applications perform conceptually simple array i o operations such as reading or writing a subarray an entire array or a list of arrays However the algorithms to perform these operations efficiently on a given platform may be complex and non portable and may require costly customizations to operating system software This thesis presents a high level interface for array i o and three implementation architectures embodied in the Panda Persistence AND
