Chandler observed that under managerial capitalism salaried managers tended to pursue policies that promoted the long term stability and growth of their enterprises The U S cable television industry provides a case study of how managers responded when stability and growth were mutually consistent objectives and when they were mutually exclusive From the late 1950s through the early 1980s agent led newspaper publishers and television broadcasters invested aggressively in the cable business Cable provided an outlet for reinvesting profits from their core businesses where growth opportunities were limited At the same time these media companies increased their long term stability by diversifying into cable because cable threatened to cannibalize their core businesses Beginning in the mid 1980s however investing in cable implied a tradeoff between stability and growth objectives As a wave of mergers swept the cable industry agent led companies avoided acquisitions Managers were concerned that acquisitions would dilute earnings and thus depress their stock prices and that diverting capital from other divisions would precipitate disruptive internal conflict Confronting an increasingly turbulent competitive environment during the first half of the 1990s agent led companies were much more likely to divest cable assets than owner managed firms In agent led companies managers believed that their cable units would require massive capital investments and they were reluctant to bet the company on a business facing so much competitive technological and regulatory uncertainty Owner managers emotionally attached to the cable industry and to the firms they had built and often harboring dynastic ambitions were more reluctant to sell they were willing to gamble on growth American Stationer and Office Manager ,1920 The Australasian Insurance & Banking Record ,1880
