Interlocking institutional structures and relationships, combined, as agencies themselves have recognized, with financial strength, seem to constitute conditions favorable for impact that have been perceived sufficiently to induce governments to consider development projects. Indeed, such structures and relationships, as the private sector has come to understand, are good indicators of the likelihood of project success. The fact that impact assessment is good evidence for a positive impact assessment is a truism that is well known to all concerned. The assessment of impact is a truism that is well known to all concerned.
