Abstract. The article addresses the problem of the quality improvement in respect of the concrete mix preparation in the context of intensive mechanization and automation. The co-authors suggest new processes to improve the performance reliability of the operating element of a mixer through the improvement of the wear resistance of its blades. The build-up of the wear-proof layer has boosted the durability of the components of the operating element of a mixer. The logical relationship between the mechanized and automated operations enabled the co-authors to adjust the optimal composition of the concrete mix. The use of composition adjusting devices, operating in the automatic mode, has substantially optimized the process of batching the mix components and the water content in the concrete mix. The co-authors provide a diagram describing the dependence between the mean square value of the outgoing signal of vibration acceleration and the mixing time until the mix is ready. The co-authors have identified that the higher the moisture content, the smaller the mixing time, and, hence, the higher the capacity of a mixer. A hybrid approach to the mix quality improvement has also reduced the operating expenses.

Key words: concrete mixing machine; concrete mix; concrete; mix quality; batching of ingredients; adjustment; batching; grades of concrete; operating expenses.

1 Introduction

The construction boom has boosted the consumption of versatile grades of high-quality concretes. Builders evidence great interest in various grades and types of concretes [1]. It is difficult to produce high-quality grades of concrete, if there is no up-to-date equipment available. The analysis of various types of concrete mixing machines, used to produce concrete mixes, has shown that the design of reliable concrete mixing machines, that have intensive mixing modes of operation, is a relevant task [2, 3, 4]. The reliability enhancement of their operating elements, the automation of mixing modes and the batching of concrete ingredients are the essential objectives to be pursued in the process of preparing different types of concretes and improving their quality [3, 4, 5]. The blades of concrete mixers are subject to the most intense wear during mixing.

A blade is a polygon-shaped element; its reliability improvement must be accompanied by special processing procedures. This element must be resistant to wear and easily
