

Strategies to reduce colic

On average, 1 out of every 10 horses will suffer from a bout of colic each year.

Managing your feeding program can help reduce the incidence of colic in your horses.

Three abrupt changes to avoid:

1

Feeding a meal (concentrate or forage) earlier or later than normal.

2

Making an abrupt change in the type or amount of

Preventing and Treating Parasites in Your Horse E. Sestric, 1996

The Epidemiology of Equine Recurrent Colic and Horse-owners' Lay Beliefs and Practices Regarding Colic Management and Prevention Claire Elizabeth Scantlebury, 2012 Reasons for performing study Colic occurs frequently within the equine population and is a high priority health concern of horse owners Recurrent colic is anecdotally common however no previous studies have investigated the epidemiology of recurrent colic in UK leisure horses Many potentially alterable risk factors have been identified that may reduce the incidence of colic In depth research into the role that horse owners perceptions and practices may have upon adoption of colic management and prevention strategies is lacking

Objectives To investigate the incidence of and risk factors for recurrent colic and to investigate the role that horse owners perceptions and practices may have upon colic management and prevention strategies

Methods To investigate recurrent colic a prospective cohort comprising 127 horses were recruited subsequent to an episode of medical colic diagnosed by a veterinary surgeon and data were collected over one year via telephone questionnaires to record health prophylaxis management and behavioural variables hypothesised to be associated with recurrent colic Baseline data were analysed using a multivariable logistic regression model to assess non time varying risk factors associated with recurrence To analyse the effect of time varying and non time varying variables data from fifty nine episodes of recurrent colic contributed case exposure data and 177 unmatched controls were randomly selected from the remaining horse time at risk in a nested case control study design A further two studies contributed to the thesis objectives The first a qualitative in depth interview based study of 15 horse owners with varying colic experience was analysed using a grounded theory methodology The findings informed the design of a cross sectional survey mailed to 1000 randomly selected horse owners in North West UK Questionnaire items included colic experience health priorities beliefs of signs and causes of colic sources of information attitudes towards colic management and prevention and the human horse relationship A cluster analysis examined owner typology groups based upon their responses to the human horse relationship items Associations between owner typology and management of colic and owner experience of colic and attitudes to colic prevention were investigated Results The incidence of recurrence was high 50 colic events 100 horse years at risk and associated risk included having a known dental problem and displaying crib biting windsucking CBWS behaviour In the nested case control study a multivariable logistic regression model found that horses displaying CBWS or weaving behaviours with reduced time spent at pasture and fed probiotics had an increased risk of recurrent colic Feeding fruit vegetables was associated with a decreased risk which interacted with the risk of recurrence among horses that displayed CBWS behaviour The qualitative study generated two theoretical models describing 1 horse owners actions while managing a colic event including 3 main responses wait and see lay treatment and seek veterinary assistance and 2 promoters and barriers involved in adopting intervention strategies to prevent colic The cross sectional survey yielded 673 questionnaires 70.8% useable response rate Owner groups differed in their management of colic and health conditions they had experience of and attempted to prevent Colic experience had a Significant effect on attitudes towards prevention Conclusions and potential relevance This thesis provides novel information on the epidemiology of recurrent colic which may contribute to the development of intervention strategies to reduce colic incidence Owners experience and understanding of the causes of colic plays a role in promoting prevention activities and seeking veterinary advice The findings improve veterinary understanding of lay beliefs surrounding colic and the client experience and will be of use in the design of appropriately targeted colic prevention advice
