ABSTRACT

A long-standing dilemma in the geology of Israel is whether the Carmel Fault (CF) is currently active and to what extent does it contribute to the seismic hazard of the city of Haifa and the nearby petrochemical industrial area. In this study we use InSAR stacking and PSInSAR to measure the surface movements on both sides of the CF. Processing single interferograms showed low signal to noise ratio (SNR), and no consistent sense of apparent displacements. Stacking interferograms improved the SNR, but uncertainties still remained high, compared to the signal. PSInSAR analysis shows no evidence for differential surface movements between the two sides of the CF. Using elastic dislocation modeling we find that the lower detection limits on the NW-SE segments of the fault, are 1 mm/year for vertical movement and 4 mm/year for horizontal sinistral movement. Thus, we cannot exclude creep along the Carmel Fault at rates lower than these limits.

1. INTRODUCTION

The Carmel Fault (CF) is the northern part of the Carmel-Far'a Fault System (CFFS) that splays off the Dead Sea Fault (DSF) and continues northwestwards into the Mediterranean Sea [1, 2, 3, 4, 5]. The CF is composed of a short central N-S striking segment between southern and northern NW-SE striking segments (Fig. 1). The surface exposure of the CFFS is not continuous along its course [1, 6]. The northwestern segment of the fault crosses the city of Haifa and its suburbs and passes a few km away from the petrochemical industry in the Haifa Bay. Based on geological, geophysical and geomorphological data the CF has been considered to be potentially active along the majority of its course [7]. Yet, defining the CF as active is not unequivocal. The earthquake catalogue (GII, 2006) and a recent earthquake relocation study [8] show a lack of seismic energy production along the northern fault segments during the last 20 years. The largest earthquake in northern Israel, outside the DSF, during the past 50 years, with a magnitude of $M_s = 5.3$, occurred on August 24, 1984 about 8 km east of the central segment of the CF (Fig. 1). Paleoseismic studies [9, 10] did not detect any fault activity younger than a few 10000s years or evidence for liquefaction in the Holocene sediments of the Haifa Bay [11]. Recently, a seismic profile across the northern segment of the CF

The red line marks the Carmel fault described as a potentially active fault [7]. Black lines are tracks of surface mapped faults (From GSI GIS database). has failed to reveal any disturbance in late Pleistocene sediments overlying the fault trace [12]. Thus, there is a growing need for precise mapping and reliable data of the Carmel fault segments to determine a possible Recent activity along the CF. The CF is characterized by both dip-slip and strike-slip components, however, the sense of recent motion is still ambiguous. In
