

regurgitate the food though their stomachs is partitioned into several chambers, and the first of these chambers houses colonies of cellulose-digesting microbes.

Eg. pigs, hippopotamuses.

MECHANISM OF ABSORPTION

The food materials are absorbed by different methods such as passive diffusion, osmosis, active absorption and facilitated diffusion.

Absorption of Carbohydrates: The end products of carbohydrate digestion are mono saccharides such as glucose, fructose and galactose. Galactose is more readily absorbed when compared to glucose and fructose. Fructose is absorbed more slowly than glucose and galactose. Glucose is absorbed by energy-dependent secondary active transport along with sodium. It requires a carrier molecule that transports both glucose and sodium simultaneously (symport) into the epithelial cells. The sodium concentration in the epithelial cells is always kept low by pumping sodium out through baso-lateral region of the cell by Na K ATPase at the expense of energy. In response to the low concentration, sodium diffuses into the cell along with glucose. As the glucose concentration increases in the cell, it enters the blood by facilitated diffusion. Glucose absorption is inhibited by ouabain (a cardiac glycoside) and phlorizin. Fructose and galactose are absorbed by simple carrier-mediated method called facilitated diffusion, without using energy. Some pentose sugars are absorbed by simple diffusion.

II. Absorption of Amino acids and Dipeptides: The end products of protein digestion are amino acids, dipeptides and tripeptides. L-amino acids are absorbed by secondary active transport, similar to that of glucose carrier system. Most of the peptides are absorbed through carrier-mediated transport systems, using energy.

III. Absorption of Lipids: Absorption of the end products of lipid digestion, mono- and diglycerides and fatty acids is a complicated process. Lipids are not easily absorbed and transported in their original form. They undergo modification and transform themselves into two distinct forms called micelles and chylomicrons).

In the first phase, the monoglycerides and fatty acids associate with bile salts,
