Freedom of Information - One Year on Great Britain: Parliament: House of Commons: Constitutional Affairs Committee, 2006-06-28 The Freedom of Information (FOI) Act and the new Environmental Information Regulations came into force fully on 1 January 2005. They give people the right of access to information held by over 100,000 public authorities across the UK. This inquiry examines the first year's experience of FOI and considers the impact which it has made. The implementation of the FOI Act has already brought about the release of significant new information. The Committee is impressed by the efforts made by public authorities to meet the demands of the Act. The most commonly cited problem for requesters was delays in responding to requests. Published data show that there are many cases where the 20-day statutory response time is not being complied with and lack of interpretation in the code of practice as to reasonable time limits enables public authorities to make indefinite extensions of many months. The report identifies a number of areas where the Department for Constitutional Affairs (DCA) should improve compliance, the immediate priority being a more assertive enforcement of the law. The complaints resolution process provided by the Information Commissioner's Office during 2005.

was unsatisfactory with many delays in starting investigation of complaints and concerns over the standard of investigation and information provided in the decisions The Committee welcomes the Commissioner's proposals to increase efficiency and effectiveness and would like the Commissioner to be directly responsible to and funded by Parliament Another area of concern is the long term preservation of electronic records Records management practices in some public authorities need substantial improvement Plans are needed to handle the rapid and significant changes in technology and the inevitable degradation of storage media Freedom of Information has no force without a proper commitment to ensure that the information held is in a retrievable form      APAIS, Australian Public Affairs Information Service ,1998 Vol for 1963
