

STEP-BY-STEP DED DIAGNOSTIC WORKFLOW

Assess symptoms, contact lens tolerance, and fluctuating vision. Ask targeted questions beyond "Do you have dry eyes?" to uncover symptoms such as epiphora and fluctuating vision clarity.

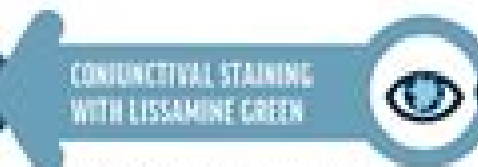

Measure tear film osmolality with devices such as the TearLab Osmolarity System (TearLab Medical). High osmolality indicates greater disease severity.

Test for the presence of matrix metalloproteinase-9, a marker for inflammation in dry eye disease (DED). This can indicate the necessity for antiinflammatory treatment.

Examine the entire lid, including margin, lash line, and meibomian gland function. Use manual expression to check for gland dysfunction.

Stain the conjunctiva to assess ocular surface damage further. Lissamine green helps identify areas of devitalized cells and mucous filaments indicative of DED.

Perform fluorescein staining to assess the tear breakup time and corneal surface. This step is crucial for evaluating tear film stability and ocular surface health.

Utilize available clinic imaging devices to evaluate gland structure. Initially, lid eversion and retroillumination with a muscle light can suffice.

Use keratometry or topography, often already available in clinics, to detect irregularities caused by a poor-quality tear film. These standard tools can be used effectively for DED assessment without necessitating new expenses. Assess tear meniscus height with the slit-lamp beam.

Based on findings, diagnose DED, determine severity, and plan treatment. Emphasize the importance of accurate diagnosis before procedures such as cataract surgery to ensure optimal outcomes.
