Sex Differences In Depression:

Sex Differences in Depression Susan Nolen-Hoeksema, 1990 Women are twice as likely as men to experience protracted sadness apathy low self esteem and other symptoms of depression How can we account for this sex difference Several explanations have been proposed some dating back many years This book critically examines the evidence for each explanation in an attempt to discover what we do and do not know about sex differences in depression It is a landmark review of the historical theoretical and empirical approaches to sex differences in depression Nolen Hoeksema presents a fresh historical review makes theoretical criticisms and offers clear and challenging avenues for future research and practical applications

Sex Differences in Depression Joy Perkins Newmann, 1982 Sex Differences in Depression Susceptibility are Modulated by Circuit Function and Eph Receptor Signaling Rachel-Karson Theriault, 2021 Major depressive disorder MDD is a debilitating affective syndrome that disproportionally affects women Despite the known predominance of depression in women most studies that have investigated the underlying pathogenesis have not employed sex as a factor Consequently the mechanisms that contribute to the increased vulnerability of females to depression remain poorly understood Thus using the chronic unpredictable stress CUS model of depression we assessed sex differences in MDD pathology at the behavioural electrophysiological and molecular levels We first characterized the sex specific neural oscillatory patterns associated with stress response in brain regions implicated in depression prefrontal cortex PFC cingulate cortex Cg nucleus accumbens and hippocampus HIP Following stress exposure stress resilient females were characterized by increased HIP theta power and cortical gamma power whereas stress resilient males exhibited a widespread increase in high gamma coherence In stress susceptible animals we observed a pattern of increased delta and reduced theta power the changes were restricted to the Cg and HIP in males but occurred globally in females To elucidate the molecular mechanisms associated with these sex specific changes in circuit function a proteomics analysis was performed on the HIP of CUS exposed male and female rats We demonstrated that the majority of altered proteins induced by stress were distinct to each sex Unique to female animals was a significant change in EphA2 receptor expression and its associated downstream effector proteins Indeed these findings were confirmed in both the HIP and PFC via immunoblotting with a greater degree of upregulation observed in the PFC The female specific role of the EphA2 receptor in depression like behaviours was subsequently confirmed Following the infusion of a selective EphA2 receptor peptide ligand agonist into the PFC only female rats exhibited despair and anxiety like behaviours as well as alterations in low frequency band oscillations that paralleled those induced by CUS exposure Collectively our results demonstrate that the molecular mechanisms and neural oscillatory patterns that underly the pathology of depression are sex specific These findings begin to inform the use of oscillatory patterns as predictive biomarkers of depression and treatment response as well as identify a potential female specific molecular target for future antidepressant pharmacotherapies

Truncated abstract This thesis examines the well established finding that women are more likely to be diagnosed with depression than are men The finding of a gender difference in depression has challenged many researchers and produced a range of biological psychological and sociological explanations The research presented here examines the gender difference in depression in a way that locates individuals in their interpersonal context The thesis begins with an exploration of the historical and theoretical context in which gender differences are located A series of three studies is then presented that identify and explore an understanding of context moving from a broad perspective to a very detailed focus on specific experiences In the first study multidimensional scaling analyses identified gaps concerned with contextual understandings of depression and lead to a discussion of the impact of the dominant individualistic medical model It is proposed that whilst the medical model has lead to considerable advances in the understanding and treatment of depression one of the disadvantages of this model is that it takes an intrapsychic perspective on illness The intrapsychic perspective deflects attention from the broader life situation of the depressed person The social and interpersonal contexts in which depressive symptoms occur have received limited recognition and acknowledgment in research and treatment From this broad perspective the second study focused more specifically on variables associated with the interpersonal context
