

Chapter One

The Nature of Black Business Development

THE American capitalist system is based on ownership. It may be ownership of a house, a business organization, stocks in a corporation, or what-not. For most Americans, when given a choice of power, of control over one's destiny, through, in ownership of a business enterprise. From the beginning of the nation this desire for ownership has been a salient feature of the American character to life. However mythical the Horatio Alger legend may be, it clearly points up a belief which plays on the American's ambivalence. A few poor farms have moved to the city and the Industrial Revolution signposts of industry. To the west they went like the pioneers; the social upheaval which businessmen saw in New England or Northwestern Iowa, a Transcendental, and upper middle class upper class. The myth, however, gave hope to many Americans whose position they could not see. "If that were made to have as lovely a beginning, then I too, was the it." Even if success were not phenomenal, surely the ownership of even a small or part-time owned business was achievement in itself.

This need for corporate wealth through business ownership permeates the whole American society and is not limited to white Americans. As a matter of fact, ownership may at this period hold even greater meaning for black Americans. Many would, however, strongly disagree with this statement; some because they would consider it inaccurate and others because it perpetuates a myth. E. Franklin Frazier clearly articulated the latter view about those in black hope of black Americans achieving liberation from their low economic position through business ownership. Frazier thought us "... there have been ideas concerning the importance of Negro business have become a social myth and have this myth has been propagated
