The experimental approach allows for making conclusions about causal relationships between variables. In experiments, the conditions of the experiment (potential confounders) are kept on a constant level, and the independent variable (IV) is manipulated to see how it affects the dependent variable (DV). The conditions being kept constant permits for concluding that the change in the IV caused the observed change in DV, thus establishing the causal relationship. Using a control group also allows for ruling out other causes of change (Cozby & Bates, 2015).

In the first experiment, participants read self-enhancing jokes, self-defeating jokes, or no jokes (control) prior to an anticipated math test. Thus, the IV was the type of humor (self-enhancing; self-defeating; none = control); the DV was anxiety scores (measured using a questionnaire).

The study exemplifies experimental research because the scholars put the participants into certain conditions and manipulated the IV (used different types of humor on them) to see how this would affect the DV (Ford et al., 2017).

The fact that the participants were subjected to no other influences than the experimental treatment permitted for concluding the causal relationship. As for sample selection, the process is not described; however, it is stated that 123 adult (aged 18-74) U.S. residents were
