

Primary Sources: Refugees in the American Colonies, 1670s-1710s

Introduction

The two main developments highlighted in the Lessons 1 and 2 of this unit - religious persecution in Europe and the trans-Atlantic slave trade - were leading to the movements of new groups of refugees in the Americas too. This new lesson also allows us to see how some of the very same people involved in Lesson 1 interacted with some of the people involved in Lesson 2, which will help us to see how the Atlantic World functioned as a system of interactions.

As you read, first consider these questions:

- Were the forced migrants described in the sources refugees? Why or why not? How does your answer compare to the migrants in Lessons 1 and 2?
- How does the goals of the author in writing this text shape our understanding of their situation? What information might they be leaving out?
- What evidence, if any, did the author want to leave behind for others to access?

When you are done, go back over the text and review Reading 3.

Make a list of all the push factors compelling them to escape and all the pull factors that might have drawn them to their new destinations.

Then list all the preexisting structures that you can identify that shaped their travel.
