What is Positive Parenting and How It Helps with Personal Development

Modern parenting researchers have devised a Positive Parenting strategy. It extols a two-way nurturing relationship based on unconditional love. The most important aspect of positive parenting is consistency: be it in caring, teaching, communicating, or providing for the child's needs. It holds children's choices and opinions in high regard.

Some prominent features of positive parenting include:

- Guiding
- Teaching
- Leading
- Empowerment
- Focus on positivity
- Care
- Warmth and affection
- Nurturing
- Understanding children's needs
- Emotional understanding
- Understanding of developmental stages
- Unconditional love
- Empathy
- Consistency
- Rewards and incentives
- Clear boundaries
- Firm rules
- Discipline
- Non-abusive
- Open two-way communication

At What Age Positive Parenting is Effective

You can start positive parenting whenever you like, but it's a case of the earlier the better. Positive parenting is effective at all stages of parenting, beginning with children still in the womb.

The infant and mother relationships have by far the greatest impact on the child's personality. A secure and close bond between mother and infant leads to confident children with low anxiety and better self-worth.

On the other hand, infants that were not cared for or nurtured in their early months often develop insecurities and anxiety, which can turn into hostility.

As the child grows older, positive parenting has deeper impacts on his personality. It helps them to grow into mature, confident, empathetic, successful adults.
