Industry and Employment

Despite the wealth of Birmingham's industrial heritage, the twentieth century has witnessed a number of profound changes to its once booming industrial structure and employment patterns. By the late nineteenth century, Birmingham had gained a reputation as a city of a thousand trades and, despite the growth of better paid businesses, many other industries were still forced to operate on small margins. In 1876, there were thought to be more than 20 firms employing more than 50 people, such as being at 1/2p per hour (Burg, 1986). However, this was soon to change, thanks to Birmingham's traditional property and being a work for the rest of the country.

During the twentieth century, technology developments and the globalisation of the economy have resulted in profound changes to the organisation and structure of British industry. While increasing mechanisation, for example, initially required fewer skilled workers and began to disempower well-qualified workers in order to gain a commercial advantage through economy of scale. New industries in Birmingham included the manufacture of bicycles, motorcycles and cars. As the century has progressed, Birmingham's traditional manufacturing industries have been increasingly challenged by competition from abroad, the development of more high-tech industries in the south of England and the general decline of manufacturing. The town has been the result of a number of factors:

The decline of manufacturing

- A world-wide recession following the oil crisis of the 1970s.
- Competition from newly industrialising countries in Asia, where labour costs and production costs are lower than in Britain.
- A lack of investment and modern plant in some British businesses.
- Problems between management and labour in industry.
- A lack of government intervention.

(OBSERV, 1992)

This decline began to take place between the 1950s and the 1970s, but reached its peak during the 1980s. Between 1979 and 1989, total employment fell by 107,300 workers and employment in manufacturing fell by 47 per cent (OBSERV, 1990). This was the first time that Birmingham had faced significant unemployment and the proportion of those without a job rose from 1 per cent of the workforce in 1979 to 11 per cent in 1989. Although this was a general trend across Birmingham, the situation was worse in the inner city, where unemployment topped 40 per cent.

In November 1992, a study was conducted in 1989 found that around half the respondents were unemployed. Of the total, well over two-thirds had been out of work for more than a year. There is employment was found to be in low pay jobs, with 72 per cent of men and 84 per cent of women having incomes of below £200 per week. By 1989, official statistics placed unemployment in Birmingham at 11 per cent (in comparison with a city average of 14 per cent), although unofficial sources suggest that the true figure was well in excess of this (see Birmingham City Council, 1992a for all statistics quoted).

While subsequent government policies have sought to help with this situation, unemployment remains a major social issue. In March 1999, there were 10,000 unemployed people in the town of Birmingham. The majority of the total number of unemployed people across the city is a white, middle-aged population. West Midlands Employment Information Unit.
