Altonji, Fumio Hayashi, Laurence J. Kotlikoff, 1996 We use the 1988 PSID to study the effects of income and wealth on transfers of money and time between individuals and their parents as well as the effects of incomes of other relatives on these flows We relate the relative incomes of parents and parents in law to transfer amounts given and received by married couples We also study how the relative incomes of divorced parents influence transfers We find that money transfers tend to reduce inequality in household incomes and that time transfers are only weakly related to income differences Richer siblings give more to parents and receive less Among parents and parents in law the richer set of parents is more likely to give money and less likely to receive money The same is true of divorced parents In contrast to the implications of simple exchange models of transfers there is little evidence in the cross section or in the analysis using siblings that parental income or wealth raises time transfers from children or that time transfers are exchanged for money transfers In the cross section and among siblings the strong negative relationship between time transfers and distance from parents is not associated with a strong negative relationship between distance and money transfers We discuss the implications of our results for alternative models of transfers
