Integrated Social Policies Raluca Sfetcu,Carmen Beatrice Pauna,Marioara Iordan,2011 On almost every account people with mental health problems are among the most excluded groups in society and they consistently identify stigmatisation discrimination and exclusion as major barriers to health welfare and quality of life The links between poverty and ill health are well known Poverty and illness together make people much more vulnerable and needy at all stages of their lives and even more so in old age Mental health is often both a cause and a consequence of poverty compromised education vulnerability difficulty accessing housing health care and employment and lack of access to welfare social security and community public services Inequalities between social classes in the incidence of chronic illness and mental illness and in life expectancy are also well documented The working class poor with health problems are a particularly vulnerable group Moreover people with mental health problems are more likely to experience physical health problems which can further compromise the efforts of the individual in an already disadvantaged situation When the experience of mental illness is the cause or a factor in the experience of exclusion the effects can be still more damaging This mutual interaction linking mental health and development can work positively with good mental health facilitating the active and successful involvement of individuals and communities in development and negatively with poor mental health increasing the risk of descending into a vicious cycle of poverty and adverse social and health outcomes Designing social policies and interventions both within and outside the health sector which strengthen social inclusion represent a key action recommended by the European Pact for Mental Health and Wellbeing This paper explores the situation of persons affected by severe mental illness on regional level in Romania The need for policy development and improvement strategies are also highlighted

Correlation Between Poverty and Mental Health Gerald C. Ogbuja, 2014 A review of epidemiological journals on mental health identifies a link between poverty and chronic health disorders Explanatory models of persons suffering from mental health disorders have been described in a number of studies in all of which poverty and socioeconomic problems have been cited as one of the most important factors causing emotional distress Patel 1995 Some medical literatures have shown a clear association between indicators of poverty and the risk of mental disorders the most consistent link being with low levels of education and income Patel et al 2003 While these indicators remain unclear to me there are still unfounded beliefs on how poverty triggers chronic mental illnesses However recent exploratory studies have strongly supported the link between poverty and mental health Drawing analysis from exploratory studies I tend to argue in this study that poverty is a gateway to mental illness This argument is based on statistical studies that have pointed out that poor mental health conditions have greater potentiality to trigger many forms of psychological distress Despites poor condition of life genetic and psychological factors supports the link between poverty and mental illness Clinicians in the last two decades have identified difficulties while untangling effects of social causation adversity and stress associated with low social statuses from those within social selection which posits that genetically predisposed persons can drift down or fail to rise in their poverty Dohrenwend Levav Shrout et al 1992 This descriptive study makes a case that there is correlation between poverty psychological distress and mental health My believe is supported by new study published in the Journal of mental health disorder which strongly argues that childhood poverty adolescents level of stress and induced mental health disorder in adults are linked together For Drishya 2012 the way we spend our childhood and the experiences we gain at our tender age stays with us for the rest of our lives This paper uses evidence research methodologies from cross sectional regions of the country to demonstrate an association between poverty and homelessness and how both are associated with mental health disorders It uses empirical studies to support a correlation that exists between depression suicidal ideation schizophrenic symptoms and anxiety disorders Future research is needed to further identify link between poverty substance dependence depression and other mental health problems Poverty alleviation and prevention efforts should target those with substance use and delinquent behaviors Psychological Factors in
