ABSTRACT. Objective: Problem drinking during college is a well-known phenomenon. However, predictors of progression to problematic drinking, particularly among ethnic minorities such as Mexican Americans, have received limited research attention. Method: The current study compared the rates and predictors of problem drinking progression from the first to the second year of college among four groups: Mexican American men, Mexican American women, White European men, and White European women ($N = 215$). At baseline, participants were all first-year college students who scored as nonproblem drinkers on the Young Adult Alcohol Problems Screening Test (YAAPST). Participants were classified as progressors or stable nondrinkers/nonproblem drinkers based on YAAPST scores 12 months later. Hypothesized predictors of progression included behavioral undercontrol, negative emotionality, alcohol use expectancies, and cultural orientation (Mexican American sample only). Differences were anticipated between gender and ethnic groups in both progression rates and predictors of progression. Results: Twenty-nine percent of the sample progressed to problematic drinking; however, no differences emerged by gender or ethnicity. For the full sample, higher behavioral undercontrol and higher negative emotionality significantly predicted progression. Differences in predictors were not found across gender and ethnic subgroups. Conclusions: The hypothesis that rates of progression to problem drinking would differ among the four gender and ethnic groups was not supported. Thus, although White European men are most often identified as at high risk for alcohol use problems, the present findings indicate that women and Mexican American students also should be targeted for prevention and/or intervention. (J. Stud. Alcohol Drugs, 72, 975–980, 2011)

YOUNG ADULTS REPORT HIGHER RATES of alcohol use than any other age group (Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, 2005), with college students reporting more drinking than young adults not in college (Slutske et al., 2004). College students who drink heavily are more likely to experience alcohol-related problems such as injury, death, and legal problems (Wechsler et al., 2000). The first year of college is a time when students are at particular risk for increasing their drinking (Fromme et al., 2008; Schulenberg and Maggs, 2002) because of a combination of greater access to alcohol and increased stress induced by added responsibilities.

College student drinking has received a great deal of research attention, with the bulk of this work examining

White students (Borsari et al., 2007). To date, few studies have focused on ethnic minority groups such as Mexican Americans, who comprise two thirds of the U.S. Hispanic population (U.S. Census Bureau, 2010). This is of particular concern because Hispanics are a substantial and growing proportion of the college population, representing 10%–20% of U.S. college students (U.S. Census Bureau, 2009). Additionally, rates of alcohol use problems among Mexican American college students are significant. College student data from the Monitoring the Future study indicate that Hispanics are at lower risk for alcohol use problems than Whites but at higher risk than African Americans (O'Malley and Johnston, 2002). Approximately 30% of Hispanics, compared with 45% of Whites and 15% of African Americans, reported heavy drinking in the past 30 days (O'Malley and Johnston, 2002). However, there is evidence that White European and Mexican American college students who reside near the U.S.–Mexico border are at comparably elevated risk for alcohol use problems (McKinnon et al., 2003).

College student drinking is influenced by both global and ethnicity-specific factors. Temperament (i.e., behavior undercontrol and negative emotionality), male gender, White race, and positive anticipated effects of alcohol use (expectancies) have all been found to reliably predict increases in drinking (Borsari et al., 2007). Differences in drinking rates among ethnic groups may reflect cultural practices and identity. For example, drinking norms differ between the United States
