REMOVED PLANTINGS

Between 1941 and the re-survey of 1982, 39 plantings (36.4% of the total of 237) were removed from consideration due to historical developments. Twenty-five (10.5%) were in the area covered by the siltation pond or by the 15-foot-high berm containing it on the east, north and west sides of the pond. The remaining 14 (5.9%) were in peripheral areas around the prairie which were subsequently planted to a forest cover, to horticultural plantings, or converted to a 5 m-wide fire lane constructed between the prairie and the forest plantings. Fourteen other prairie plantings were also partially destroyed by these developments, but as long as a portion of each area is still retained as prairie it is listed as a separate, albeit a reduced and smaller, planting area.

STATISTICAL DATA

Since it is not feasible to include here all of the statistical details of these plantings and re-surveys, it should be noted that the original notes and maps and complete statistical tabulations of the analysis are on file in the Director's office at the Arboretum (The University of Wisconsin-Madison Arboretum, 1207 Seminole Highway, Madison, Wisconsin 53711. Telephone 608-262-2746) and may be examined upon request by parties having use for this information.

SURVIVAL OF PRAIRIE PLANTINGS AND SPECIES

The success of each of the plantings was measured by the percentage of the planted spots containing plants of the primary species at the time of the re-survey. These ranged from excellent (for 100% of the spots) to zero (no plants found), with 6 categories recognized as shown in Table 1.

Plantings with category ratings of very good, good or fair were considered successful, while those with ratings poor, very poor or zero were listed as unsuccessful.

Of the 198 plantings still extant for the 1982 re-survey, 108 (55%) may be considered as successful, and 90 (45%) as unsuccessful. A pronounced difference in survival was noted between the grasses (Table 2) and the forbs (Table 3) as summarized in Table 4.

Commentary on Species Persistence

It was assumed during the initial years that not all plantings would be successful. The whole arboretum project was initiated on a substantial amount of faith! Which of the trials would be successful remained to be determined.

It was known, of course, that much of the Curtis Prairie environment was not ideal for many of the prairie species, but when seed (or plants) were on hand, they were used with the hope that some of them might survive. Hence there were a few small plantings (some with as few as 10 spots) for seeds that were on hand, for which no repeat plantings were attempted, e.g. Aselepias incarnata, Castilleja sessiliflora, Sisyrinchium campestre, Lobelia cardinalis. Likewise, some of the smaller prairie grasses normally occur on lighter, drier soils, but when such were not available (at that time) on the Arboretum, they were planted on heavier soils. It was hoped that some of them would survive if not flourish. This was actually the case only with Stipa spartea and Andropogon scoparius (Table 3).

The failure of 28% of the forb species to become established is about what might have been anticipated, but the failure of 8 (61%) of the grass species was substantially greater than expected. Perhaps it is natural to be disappointed with these non-persisting experimental species, but we still have ample cause for elation concerning the large number of persisting species, some of them spectacularly successful.

The highly successful species can be divided into 2 general groups—those which have persisted for many (more than 40) years, growing, flowering and fruiting well, but not spreading significantly from their original planting areas, and those which have not only grown very well, but have spread, either by seeds or by rhizomes or both, far beyond the boundaries of their original planting areas. Plants in the latter group, those now widely spread over much of the Curtis Prairie area since the original plantings, include Andropogon gerardii and Sorghastrum nutans among the upland grasses and Spartina pectinata in the wet prairies, and for the upland forbs, Baptisia leucantha, Echinacea purpurea, Eryngium yuccifolium, Liatris aspera, Ratibida pinnata and Silphium terebinthaceum, among others. No wetland forbs were abundant.

Documentary Species

Noteworthy among the poorly-spreading persisters are Amorpha canescens, Baptisia leucophæa, Ceanothus americanus, Helianthus laetiflorus, Phlox pilosa, Rosa carolina, Silphium integrifolium, S. laciniatum and Stipa spartea.

It is this group which proved to be the most useful in documenting the 1982 re-survey. Although the original
