Prepared by Dr Patrick O. Akinsanya

LESSON ONE

What is Philosophy/Philosophy of Education?

Learning Objectives:

At the end of the lesson, learners should be able to:

1. Define philosophy in their own possible way
2. Identify and discuss major modes of philosophy
3. Conceptualise the meaning of philosophy of education
4. Enumerate the major modes of philosophy of education

Meaning of Philosophy

Various philosophers define philosophy in various ways. Each attempt at a definition raises a criticism which could sometimes lead to metaphilosophy, that is, philosophizing about philosophy. But one wonders less about this situation when one realises that every philosophy is a product of so many factors such as; one's environment, one's background and orientation, one's experiences, one's education and exposure, and one's natural affiliations and propensities, which are definitely different across board. It logically follows that if philosophy is a product of all of these mentioned factors, then one's perception about the meaning and function of philosophy will vary. This explains the reason for the difference in thought pattern of Aristotle and his teacher, Plato. It equally explains the significant difference in Dewey's thinking and Rousseau's, and so on. But suffice it to mention that despite these divergences in the conception of philosophy, certain activities and tenets are common among philosophers. This is to say that from the ancient period to medieval, to modern, to contemporary period, philosophers have engaged in some preoccupations which cut across board. To understand philosophy therefore, while trying to escape vilifications at the attempt to define it, one may simply reflect on what philosophers have preoccupied themselves with down the ages and the modes used in philosophising. In this reflection, it should be easy for you to discern the meaning and the activity called philosophy.

Selected Topics In Philosophy:

Selected Topics in Philosophy John L. Bowman, 2002-06-21 Selected Topics in Philosophy is an eclectic mix of various topics in philosophy including the nature of language epistemology ethics the nature of religion and literature metaphysics existentialism and transcendentalism Some particularly interesting issues discussed in the book include George Berkeley and John Locke's theories on the difference between language and reality most confusion and much conflict in the world seems to be because we use words for things that do not exist Immanuel Kant's transcendental idealism and in particular his discussion of antinomies we are not passive tabula rasas on which the external world writes but rather active minds organizing and making sense of a random and incomprehensible world Jean Paul Sartre's existential admonition that we must accept the world with no telos which naturally leads us to the truism that if we wish life to have meaning we must look to ourselves to create it the question of whether there are certain timeless objective standards by which we can judge human actions if we cannot and ethics is subjective how do we distinguish between good and evil what are the limits to our knowledge are there certain immutable truths which we can discover which are built like a pyramid with a broad foundation and each layer resting on the one below or is all knowledge simply how well things cohere like a raft on the open sea floating around with no permanent tether
