

sat/16 Today's Question

The passage is adapted from Christopher Hapgood, "Road Noise Takes a Toll on Migrating Birds," ©2015 by Scientific American.

1. Building a road through wilderness certainly has a visible impact on local flora and fauna—you're physically paving over a slice of what was once habitat. But roads have less obvious effects, too. Like the introduction of traffic noise, which also takes a toll. "You can see an oil spill but you can't see a traffic noise spill. So convincing people that it's important is a little more difficult," said Frank Ware.

2. Ware is an ornithologist at the International Bird Observatory in Boise, Idaho. He and his colleagues studied the reactions by birds to the sounds of vehicles. And they did it without going the great outdoors. Instead, they mounted 10 pairs of speakers on Douglas fir trees, strung a ridge near Boise, and played traffic noise. They then created what they call a "phantom road" through the wilderness, which boosted local noise levels 10 decibels higher than those in the surrounding forest.

3. Turns out just the sounds of traffic caused about a third of the area's usual avian visitors, and bird species diversity too. And birds of multiple species were not able to perch on as much foliage to fuel their migrations, when they were around noise and the resulting vibrations.
