The Philosophy of Science Fiction James Burton,2013-06 If philosophy desires to understand the world science fiction dreams of saving it Yet what if these were not two separate hopes but intertwined within a general human tendency namely the capacity to fictionalize The Philosophy of Science Fiction brings together two figures for whom our ability to make fictions a reality to conceive of and even believe in the impossible is at the root both of our attempts to understand the universe and of our struggles to survive within it Henri Bergson renowned for his philosophical investigations of time memory and evolution and Philip K Dick author of some of the most highly praised science fiction of the twentieth century were born some 70 years apart into drastically different cultural milieu Yet for both modern humanity faces a critical threat in the combination of its own ancient tendency to mechanize itself and its environment with the explosive material power unleashed by modern technology Moreover they refute the idea implicit in so many areas of modern political moral scientific and religious thinking that we must choose between materialism and idealism between rationality and faith On the contrary both find in the power of fictionalizing new possibilities of salvation in a world seemingly abandoned by the gods
