Pluralism in Africa. Edited by LEO KUPER and M. G. SMITH. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1969. Pp. x+346, bibl. $12.75, £6. 2s.

To Shils and Kornhauser a pluralist society is what we wish democracy to be: one in which many interests compete and consensus is reached by healthy discussion. To Furnivall a plural society was one in which there could be no consensus because the different sections were linked only by economic transactions and never engaged in discussion; there could be no 'common will' (we didn't talk about consensus in those days), and order was maintained by the dominant section. One might say that the concern of some of the contributors to this book is how it may be possible for plural societies to become pluralist, while others are interested in defining and classifying plural societies without drawing any practical conclusions.

In fact they reject the Shils definition, and use 'pluralism' wholly in the pejorative sense, and 'depluralization' for the process that they would like to see. However, they demonstrate their own Shilsian pluralism in the introductory section, where M. G. Smith puts forward a definition which Pierre van den Berghe rejects. Furnivall is criticized for assuming that all plural societies were colonial; yet most of them have been, and it is not much of an argument to observe that they were not deppluralized on becoming independent. Furnivall's writings do not suggest that he thought they would be. Against him, however, M. G. Smith introduces the 'case-studies' section with an impressive continent-wide survey of plural societies in pre-colonial Africa.

Leo Kuper discusses ideologies of violence in plural societies and the prospects of non-violent change in 'settler societies', which of course include South Africa. Pierre Alexandre describes 'social pluralism' in the Francophone states. Hilda Kuper compares the position of the Indian community in Uganda and in South Africa, and reminds us that cultural assimilation, which to a dominant group is an expression of liberalism, is apt to be an admission of inferiority to a minority. Michael Lofchie writes on politics in Zanzibar, and Basil Davidson on the early days of the British presence in central Africa, where, he says, Africans and Europeans were united only by 'a mutually hateful contiguity'. Max Gluckman counters this interpretation from his experience both in South Africa and in different parts of Zambia, where he observed considerable consensus between Africans and the administrators who lived among them.

The second historian contributor, Leonard Thompson, reminds us that colonial rule laid the foundations for the integration now so ardently desired. He also discusses the paradoxical interplay between liberal policies emanating from the metropolis, often implemented to the best of their ability by local administrators, and the interests of settlers who were able to thwart them up to the time when metropolitan control was removed. In South Africa the settlers were entrenched by that time, as they have proved to be in Rhodesia; but not elsewhere.

Ali Mazrui with his customary ingenuity and elegance argues that the very experience of conflict and its resolution brings divisions of the plural society closer together and teaches them to compromise. Alas, the example that he has chosen to illustrate his argument is Nigeria. M. G. Smith sums up with an elaborate and far from easy scheme for the analysis of different types of pluralism, and Leo Kuper with a conspectus of the principal ideas advanced by the different contributors.

Those of us who have experienced some 'exposure to' the vocabulary of philosophy
