acts of repression and by ineptitude Focusing on the role of KMT party elites in the democratization process Steven Hood considers the KMT s evolution from a Leninist party state to a fractious party in a competitive political system Many contemporary studies suggest that democratization is the product of decisions compromises and accidents the result of relatively short term confrontations among elites in the opposition and softliners and hardliners within authoritarian regimes Although these factors are important the democratization of Taiwan has been a long term process of elites wrestling within the confines of existing political institutions Taiwan s case study reminds us that we need to revisit the prerequisites that must underline a true democracy factors that are too often ignored or dismissed by scholars studying the democratization process   The Future of Electronic Commerce in California California.
