Hardisty,Dale W. Griffin,Thomas Allard,2023 This research examines the effectiveness of two common types of restricted price promotions threshold promotions conditional on spending more than a threshold amount or a promotion trigger and capped promotions limited to a maximum dollar value or a cap trigger Results show that threshold promotions are more effective than comparable capped promotions even though capped promotions dominate in economic savings when the promotional trigger value the critical spending level is low because consumers use the trigger value as an expectation based reference point leading to perceptions of greater fairness However when the trigger value is high this effect reverses and capped promotions are seen as fairer and consequently are more effective than threshold promotions We observe these results in a series of six pre registered studies including a field study on TikTok in both price and charity promotion contexts and for separate and joint evaluation modes We discuss the implications of our results for the effective management of price promotions      TikTok Advertising: Jonathan K.
