

the leading institutional shareholder, investment management firm, or advisory firm, also takes its own self-interest into account, such as possibly obtaining benefits for itself that have not provided sufficient value to shareholders. Institutional shareholders are also subject to the same conflicts of interest as private shareholders. Finally, institutional shareholders may have different objectives than private shareholders. For example, institutional shareholders may have different views on the value of a company's stock than private shareholders. The fact that institutional shareholders are not always aligned with private shareholders is a potential source of conflict.
