

The Civil Code of the Russian Federation from Foreign and Comparative Law Perspectives: An Introduction

Peter J. Sahlas

Abstract

The author provides context to the readers of the six papers featured in this issue of the Review of Central and East European Law, which examine elements of the new Civil Code of the Russian Federation from foreign and comparative law perspectives. A brief history of the milestones in Quebec and Russian experiences in private law codification is supplemented with a narrative describing the lead role played in the latter by the Private Law Research Center in Moscow, and the support role played by, among others, the McGill University Faculty of Law.

This issue of the Review of Central and East European Law features six papers examining elements of the new Civil Code of the Russian Federation from foreign and comparative law perspectives. These papers were written by professors at the McGill University Faculty of Law in the context of an ongoing program of scholarly exchange between Canadian and Russian jurists.

Founded in Montreal in 1848, the McGill University Faculty of Law is situated in the province of Quebec, a stronghold of the European civil law tradition in North America. Proximity to the other Canadian provinces and to the United States, where the common law tradition is predominant, has long made the Faculty a center of expertise in comparative law. The Faculty established its Institute of Comparative Law in 1966 to promote research in private, commercial, international and public law from the perspectives of diverse legal traditions. Members of the Faculty have traditionally played instrumental roles in the development of the law, both inside Canada and internationally. Inside Canada these roles have included involvement in the elaboration of two civil codes. The Faculty's first dean, Charles Dewey Day, was one of three commissioners responsible for drafting the 1866 Civil Code of Lower Canada, which remained the primary expression of Quebec civil law for over a century.¹ In 1966, a Quebec Civil Code Revision Office was created, under the stewardship of the Faculty's Paul-André Crépeau, with a mandate to reform the code so as to entrench a broad range of modern developments in commercial practice, social values, and related legislative policy and legal theory. After a tremendous, decades-long undertaking, the new Civil Code of Quebec was enacted in 1991 and came into force as of 1994.
