The European Union's Influence in Central Asia Olga Alinda Spaiser, 2018-03-12 Unknown yet highly strategic Central Asia attracts the interest of major global powers due to its vast energy resources and crucial geographic position Russia China and the European Union view this region as an indispensable springboard to enhance their political and economic influence on the Eurasian landmass Thus facing strong competition and working on low budget the EU is attempting to establish itself as a relevant and influential actor in an environment in which its leadership role is far from certain Unlike in other post communist regions the EU is not able to rely on the attractiveness of its political models and risks being marginalized by other global powers The crucial question then is How does the EU exert influence in such a challenging geopolitical context Which strategies does the EU apply to be an actor who counts Through an analysis of the EU's discourse instruments and the reception of its policies in Central Asia this study argues that the EU consciously takes the position of a second tier actor who acts as a consultant and projects a picture of itself as an honest broker with no geopolitical agenda The EU's influence is confined to niche domains in the security sphere that are nevertheless important for the regional security The EU is not a great power in the region nor is it willing to become one It does however have comparative advantages in being perceived as inoffensive and for occupying areas that are neglected by the other actors such as governance and water security
