

Biomes

Biomes are big ecosystems (see page 42). Each kind of biome has particular weather patterns and contains plants and animals that are suited to the environment.

Coniferous forest

Coniferous forests are cool all year round and most of the trees there have needle-shaped leaves. These forests are found in North America, Europe and Asia.

Most coniferous trees stay green all year long. They often have cones to hold their seeds.

Tropical rainforest

Tropical forests are hot and wet throughout the year. They grow in South America, southern Asia, Africa and Australia.

Tropical forests are home to many brightly colored animals.

Deciduous forest

Deciduous forests are warm in summer and cold in winter. The trees grow in eastern Europe, North America, Asia and Australia. Most of the animals that live there migrate to warmer places in winter.

In summer, deciduous trees are green.

In winter, all the leaves have fallen.

Mountains

Mountains are high, pointed areas that are bare and cold all year. There are more plants and animals further down a mountain, where it's warmer. The very highest mountains are in Asia and South America.

Mountain goats are good climbers and have a thick coat to keep them warm.

Grasslands

Grasslands are huge open areas with grasses, few plants and bushes, and only a few trees. There are two types of grasslands.

Tropical grasslands are in places that are hot and have rainy seasons, such as South America, Africa and Asia.

Tropical grasslands have enough rain for trees to grow.

Temperate grasslands are dry with hot summers and cold winters. They grow in North America, Europe and Asia.

The dry weather of temperate grasslands means only small plants and a few trees can grow.

Tundra

Tundra is bare, sometimes rocky ground at the very northernmost parts of America and Europe. The ground is frozen all year round.

Most animals that live in the tundra hibernate, because they have the longest winter of any season.

Deserts

Deserts are areas of land that are so dry that very little can survive there. The biggest deserts are in Africa, the east of Asia, and Australia.

Scorpions are covered by a tough outer layer to protect their bodies from the scorching desert heat.

Oceans

Oceans cover most of the Earth's surface. They can be warm or cold, depending on where they are in the world. The further down into an ocean you go, the darker it becomes. Each layer of the ocean is home to different types of creatures.

Turtles spend most of the brightest, top ocean layer.

Calappa live in the dark, middle ocean layer.

Many deep-sea fish live in the darkest, ocean depths.
