

Phraseology and Language Attrition in an International School Context

Dr. Rena Alasgarova

The Modern Educational Complex Named in Honour of Heydar Aliyev, Azerbaijan

Abstract

First language attrition, the partial forgetting of one's mother tongue due to extensive exposure to a second language, is typically studied in migrants with limited native language input. However, this phenomenon is increasingly observed in international schools where English is the primary medium of instruction. This qualitative case study investigates the link between second language exposure and the decline of phraseological units in the native language within English-medium international schools. The study involves a semi-structured interview with a secondary school student in Azerbaijan. Continuous second language exposure has led to L2 interference at a phraseological level. Findings reveal that academic and sociolinguistic factors influence the deterioration of native language performance, depending on the quality and quantity of second language input. NVivo software was employed to assist in interview transcription, coding, and thematic analysis. The results illustrate the challenges faced by the participant in maintaining native language proficiency in an English-dominated environment, leading to language attrition, miscommunications, and altered phraseological units.

Keywords: attrition, crosslinguistic interference, phraseology, international schools

1. Introduction

Language attrition refers to the decline in native language proficiency due to reduced use, often occurring when individuals adopt a second language (L2) as their primary means of communication [1]. These changes in the proficiency of the first language (L1) are affected by sociolinguistic factors (gender, age, class, occupation, education level, etc.) [2] and the speaker's linguistic environment [1]. The existing body of scholarly work on language attrition exhibits a notable trend towards investigations conducted within immigrant settings, while relatively limited attention has been dedicated to exploring language attrition phenomena within the context of international schools where English serves as the medium of instruction. This study explores the connection between L2 exposure and its impact on native speakers' proficiency in using phraseological units in their L1, highlighting language attrition dynamics in educational settings. Phraseology encompasses the fixed expressions, idioms, and formulaic language patterns that play a crucial role in native-like language use. Phraseological attrition, within the context of language attrition, refers to the erosion of these linguistic elements. Research indicates that individuals who predominantly use an L2 may exhibit alterations in their use of phraseological units [3]. They might rely more on literal or non-idiomatic language, leading to less native-like language production. Phraseological attrition is particularly evident in bilingual and multilingual communities, where individuals navigate between multiple languages and cultural contexts. This dynamic interplay can impact their ability to maintain a rich repertoire of idiomatic expressions in each language.

2. Methodology

Qualitative research is employed in applied linguistics to explore the extent to which individuals interact with experiences and phenomena in specific contexts [4]. This study investigates the connection between the quality and quantity of L2 input and the understanding and use of phraseological units in L1 within an international school setting. To gain a deeper understanding of language attrition, a qualitative case study approach was adopted [5] which allowed for a comprehensive exploration of the phenomenon from a firsthand source. An instrumental case study design was chosen to examine language attrition from a broader perspective rather than focusing on solving a particular case [5]. Data collection involved semi-structured interviews, incorporating pre-designed closed questions while allowing flexibility for open-ended inquiries [6]. This approach encouraged the participant to share his insights beyond the structured questions.
