Environmental assessment and development edited by R Goodland, V Edmundson; World Bank, Washington, DC, 1994, 159 pages, $15.95 paper, ISBN 0 8213 2762 3

This collection of papers is drawn from a conference of the International Association for Impact Assessment held in Washington, DC in August 1992, as a follow-up to the Earth Summit in June of that year. Although some of the papers are concerned solely with the assessment process, others pose deeper questions about sustainability, and others deal with development issues in general without specific analysis of the assessment process or the challenge of sustainability. Thus there is a certain amount of variability in purpose, style, and depth, as is often the case in a collection of conference proceedings.

Ironically, two of the papers that posed the most significant questions, (and that went furthest in the search for answers), appear as the last two in the collection: "The sustainable supply rule for economic valuation of national capital depletion" (Joachim von Amsberg), and "Operationalising sustainable development by investing in natural capital" (Herman Daly). If these two papers had appeared at the front, along with Raymond Mikesell's "Environmental assessment and sustainability at the project and program level", then the reader would be better able to put the other papers within a critical framework.

The papers covered case studies in a variety of places—Zimbabwe, Thailand, Indonesia, Costa Rica, Nigeria—and a variety of sectors, including forestry, wildlife, hydroelectric power, petroleum, and urban management. The heterogeneity of the interests of the authors (21 in total, contributing 13 papers) reflects the state of play in the development business as the real challenge of the sustainable-development goal becomes apparent. Some practitioners are concerned with improvements to current practice—such as, public involvement in environmental assessment (EA) and the protection of biodiversity—whereas others have peered into the abyss of exponential population growth and unrestrained resource throughput. Overall, there was a sense of lack of convergence in the contributors' thoughts on the future of "development and environment", and, indeed, whether there was a future at all.

There were a startling number of references to Harold Hotelling's 1931 paper, "The economics of exhaustible resources" as well as to Arthur Pigou (1932), and Nicholas Georgescu-Roegen (1971), and Herman Daly was able to remind the audience that "the concept of sustainability has been recognised and incorporated into the very definition of income as 'the maximum amount that a community can consume over some time period and still be as well off at the end of the period as at the beginning' (Hicks 1946)" (page 152). All of this served as a reminder that these issues have been around for a long time prior to the period of current concerns about atmospheric change.

Daly's main point of attack is the widely held assumption that manmade (sic) capital (machines, technology, knowledge) can be substituted for natural capital (sources and sinks) indefinitely. This assumption is the basis for technological optimism—surely one of the most dangerous assumptions in policy circles today. Daly explains that these factors are complements, not substitutes, and thus "the one in shortest supply will be the limiting factor" (page 153), and that "we have moved from a world relatively full of natural capital and empty of manmade capital (and people) to a world relatively full of the latter and empty of the former" (page 153). Thus we face "new patterns of scarcity" and it is these that we must recognise. His brief paper also offers some explanations as to how this new pattern of scarcity emerged—without economists noticing it—a point which must have puzzled many people.

The paper by von Amsberg goes a long way towards operationalising some of the key concepts identified by Daly and illustrated in other parts of the collection. He focuses on the problem of intergenerational equity posed by the depletion of the exhaustible resources such as oilfields and he calculates the shadow price required in project analysis to allow for compensation to future generations for such losses. As he points out, "any sustainable activity
