Trust and Contracts Andrew Coulson, 1998 This is a book about trust in local government in the health service in military leaders in politicians between regulators and those they regulate It starts from first principles and is essential reading for students of the public sector who want to understand why best value and relational contracting are replacing pure private sector models such as compulsory competitive tendering It also sets out to stimulate creative thought and aims to influence managers not in the naive sense that they trust regardless but as an incentive to examine their practice and that of their organisations to see how more trust might lead to more efficiency and to a greater involvement of ordinary citizens in the services they use This ground breaking collection focuses on key public service issues of continuing significance Its concerns are highly relevant to the debates around the reshaping of the public sector and the meaning of the public services which have followed from the election of the Blair government The main examples are drawn from local government but the
