Class Meetings: Teachers and Young

Children Co-Constructing Problem Solving, 2009 ABSTRACT Class Meetings with a teacher and group of young children ages 3 5 provide a forum for creative group problem solving both establishing a community of learners and developing oral language skills The construction of a child s oral language and problem solving skills is far reaching and is an underlying theme in many areas of social and emotional growth including moral development character development conflict resolution identification of values self esteem and academic improvement The theoretical framework for this study is based on various scholarly sources including those concerned with early childhood group learning oral language and problem solving During this 12 week action research study both teacher talk and children s problem solving strategies were addressed to answer the following research questions What roles do teachers play in Class Meetings What types of teacher talk are used to influence student thinking and talk within Class Meetings What problems are identified in a Class Meeting with young children What problem solving strategies do young children develop within Class Meetings The research design and methodology include videotaping audio taping Class Meetings and transcribing these interactions with preschool children in an early childhood classroom setting Results indicate that during this study attendance at the Class Meetings increased and that young children when given the opportunity to self select chose to attend the Class Meetings over other available activities Also this study suggests that the Class Meeting model and effective teacher talk support student oral language the use of positive communication problem identification and the development of problem solving strategies Implications for early childhood educators teacher educators policymakers and researchers are discussed
