ABSTRACT – The emergence of inclusive education has altered the landscape of special education placements, dismantling segregation. This report performed one-on-one, semi-structured interviews with a convenience sample of three college students with disabilities using a qualitative research methodology. This study examined the obstacles and problems experienced by students with disabilities in higher education and hypothesize on the quality of integrated higher education. The research subject believed that the main difficulties experienced in the educational process include living environment, academic learning, and interpersonal communication. The findings of this research indicated that inclusive education is the most effective approach for accommodating students with disabilities, and universities should implement changes to ensure their full inclusion and participation.

INTRODUCTION

With the call of the civil rights movement for freedom and equality and the pursuit of the ideal of integrated education by the postmodernist trend, the mission to investigate the educational experiences of disadvantaged groups (including people with disabilities, ethnic minorities, and low-income groups) in the field of higher education, to understand the quality of the educational process, and to seek the value of education has become an important issue in the study of Western higher education and higher integrated education (Moriña et al., 2020). Inclusive education in the West is anchored in a liberal and democratic political system that respects pluralistic ideals, and its growth is a thorough product of cultural changes in Western culture and the evolution of social theories and concepts. In China, integrated education is anchored in our distinctive ethics of altruism and socialist humanism, and it incorporates the ethical traits of "special care." Higher education based on China's social culture has its own growth features, but it also faces unique challenges. This study attempts to understand the main difficulties experienced by disabled college students in the inclusive education process through a qualitative research method of interviews.

PROBLEM STATEMENT

China Ministry of Education (2020) reported that the gross enrolment rate of higher education in China has reached 54.4% and is transitioning from the popularisation period to the universalisation era. As the largest disadvantaged group in China, however, the gross enrollment rate of higher education for students with disabilities is less than 2.8% of their peers, and the number of college students with disabilities accounts for only 1.6% of the total enrollment in higher education, which is far behind the mass higher education. Moreover, the articulation between basic education and higher education in the field of special education demonstrates a "fault line" phenomenon, and the number of students with disabilities at the higher education level in China lags significantly behind that of basic education (49.47% of special education students in general primary and secondary schools in 2020). Higher education for students with disabilities is still elitist (Deng & Poon McBrayer, 2012). Students with disabilities are still at an extreme disadvantage in terms of access to quality and equitable higher education opportunities. This study aims to identify the characteristics of challenges and responses encountered by college students with disabilities, understand the adverse effects of disabilities on the
