

regional and global use of hydrometric information. NHIS are central to the success of such systems, providing reliable access to, and guidance on, national data contributions. While internationally networks may vary with respect to organisation set-ups, gauging methods, data management and data dissemination policies, useful synergies can be developed in all stages of the hydrometric information lifecycle to improve the overall utility of the information output.

National and international hydrometric information services are critical to meeting global water management needs. Observational frameworks should be reviewed at all levels to ensure the fitness for purpose of river flow information available to users. In the light of ever-increasing global water management challenge, the widespread decline of hydrometric network and continued barriers to data sharing, there is a pressing need to improve understanding of the value of hydrological data.
