ABSTRACT

The Fifth International Workshop on Advances in Electrocorticography convened in San Diego, CA, on November 7–8, 2013. Advancements in methodology, implementation, and commercialization across both research and in the interval year since the last workshop were the focus of the gathering. Electrocorticography (ECoG) is now firmly established as a preferred signal source for advanced research in functional, cognitive, and neuroprosthetic domains. Published output in ECoG fields has increased tenfold in the past decade. These proceedings attempt to summarize the state of the art.

1. Introduction

A. Ritaccio

The Fifth International Workshop on Advances in Electrocorticography (ECoG) took place on November 7–8, 2013, in San Diego, California. Advances in ECoG research and applications demand at least a yearly reckoning to keep pace with pertinent developments. This workshop has provided a venue for such a review since our inaugural meeting in 2008. This fifth workshop manifested the promise of ECoG-based recording by elucidating the evolution of viable clinical and research applications in the clinical, behavioral, and experimental neurosciences. Once again, strong emphasis was given to the role and contribution of the patient with epilepsy as the window into human ECoG. Advances in methodology, implementation, and commercialization of passive functional mapping using ECoG were updated. Electrocorticography-driven neurobehavioral insights into frontal lobe functions, such as language prediction, were presented. A contemporary review of consensus and controversy in the recording and utility of pathologic high-frequency oscillations put a decade's worth of observations into a practical perspective. The inevitable and valuable incorporation of ECoG tools in multimodal functional localization was summarized. Transformative changes in design and manufacture of high-density customized ECoG electrode arrays were described to an audience of clinicians and
