Abstract: Aim: Interpersonal sensitivity and mistrust are the main characteristics of cluster A personality disorders (CAPD) which might be due to the high accessibility to negative suggestions from environments. Yet the exact associations between hypnotic suggestibility and their personality disorder functioning styles remain unclear. Methods: We invited 36 patients with CAPD and 115 healthy volunteers to undergo the Stanford Hypnotic Susceptibility Scale: Form C (SHSS-C) and Parker Personality Measure (PERM). Results: Compared to controls, patients scored higher on PERM paranoid; schizoid; schizotypal; borderline; avoidant; and dependent styles; on the SHSS-C total and “challenge suggestions”, and the passing rates of “hand lowering”, “arm rigidity”, “dream”, and “arm immobilization”. In patients, “dream” negatively predicted the schizoid; “hallucinated voice” negatively the schizotypal; “mosquito hallucination” positively the histrionic and dependent; and “arm immobilization” negatively the avoidant style. Conclusions: Our results suggested that the insusceptibility to perceptual suggestions from others and the high control over body contribute to the paranoid attitude and interpersonal avoidance in CAPD. These findings help to understand the cause of interpersonal problems in these patients and suggest the trial of hypnotherapy for them.

1. Introduction

Cluster A personality disorders (CAPD, including the paranoid, schizoid and schizotypal types) are characterized by “odd and eccentric” behaviors and share some similar clinical symptomatology with schizophrenia [1], but both their pharmacological and psychotherapeutic treatment effects are far from satisfactory [2–4]. Reasons for their poor therapeutic effects are diverse, and one of them is due to insufficient research regarding their pathology. A twin study has shown that CAPD is largely determined by genes, and by environmental risk factors as well [5]. In clinics, limited evidence has shown that the paranoid personality disorder is marked heavily by suspicious- and hostile-related perceptual-cognitive “positive” symptoms, the schizoid by extreme social isolation stemming from a lack of desire for interpersonal relationships, and the schizotypal by both perceptual-cognitive “positive” deficits and interpersonal problems [2]. In general, CAPD patients display interpersonal mistrust and sensitivity, even those related to doctors and therapists [3,4]. The interpersonal problems as the core symptoms in these patients were reported to be highly correlated with the negative core beliefs about the self and others [6,7], and the perception of dissimilarity of the self with others [6,8]. Notably, evidence
