Only the results that appeared in the first ten pages of each database were considered for inclusion in the annotated bibliography, while those that appeared in subsequent pages were excluded from the study. Each scholar whose literature fell in the inclusion criteria was the further search for other papers yielding a total of 219 papers. All these papers were further screened for validity. The final screening and filtering based on key terms, results, hypothesis, study purpose, study question, and methodology used left only five kinds of literature that were finally selected for this annotated bibliography.

Barnard et al., (2016) argue that plant-based eating plans have improved diabetes management among the elderly. According to the authors, vegan eating plans reduce weight, cholesterol concentrations, glycemia, and low-density lipoprotein to a greater extent than eating plans that rely on controlled portions. Barnard et al., (2016) noted that similar benefits are possible with weekly nutrition classes when implemented through an endocrinology practice. The study indicated that using a vegan eating plan can improve the body's ability to control weight, glycemic levels, lipid concentration, blood pressure, and renal functions. Barnard et al., (2016) concluded that the integration of weekly classes in clinical practice using portion-controlled
