caused by other elements of the welfare system This popular view that the credit is unlikely to hold among married couples Theory suggests that primary earners typically men would increase labor force participation but secondary earners would reduce their labor supply in response to an EITC We study the labor supply response of married couples to several EITC expansions between 1984 and 1996 While our primary interest is the response to changes in the budget set induced by the EITC our estimation strategy takes account of budget set changes caused by federal tax policy and by cross sectional variation in wages income and family size We use both quasi experimental and reduced form labor supply models to estimate the impact of EITC induced tax changes The results suggest that EITC expansions between 1984 and 1996 increased married men s labor force participation only slightly but reduced married women s labor force participation by over a full percentage point Overall the evidence suggests that family labor supply and pre tax family earnings fell among married couples Our results imply that the EITC is effectively subsidizing married mothers to stay at home and therefore have implications for the design of the program
