activities that reflect the functional disabilities often associated with COPD Results A series of studies provided some evidence for the validity of the self efficacy construct As predicted self efficacy expectations were systematically and significantly correlated with both pulmonary function and exercise test variables Following the intervention the rehabilitation patients demonstrated non significant increases in self efficacy expectations for walking despite significantly improved treadmill performance In addition the modest enhancement of self efficacy for walking did not generalize to other similar behaviors There were however significant differences between the two groups on subjective ratings of breathlessness and fatigue following the treadmill endurance test There was a significant linear relationship between initial efficacy for walking and actual treadmill performance with patients high in efficacy demonstrating greater endurance on the treadmill A two x three analysis of variance demonstrated that changes in efficacy expectations were also influenced by group assignment with demonstrated main effects for group and self efficacy for walking Although self efficacy expectancies predicted actual treadmill performance they did not predict other health status outcomes Conclusions The findings provide mixed support for the usefulness of the self efficacy construct in understanding health behavior change in COPD patients The data raise some questions about the functional relationship between successful performance experiences and enhancement of self efficacy expectations Further investigations into self efficacy expectancies in more seriously ill patients is needed Voice of
