

Totem poles serve as public depictions of family legacies, events and other important stories within a family or tribe.

Every figure has a unique significance, no matter where it's placed on the totem pole.

All totem poles are carved from the cedar tree, a wood that is central to the lives of many Native people in the Pacific Northwest.

Totem poles are most often erected in a ceremony called a "potlatch," held to commemorate events such as marriage, coming of age or death.

Types of totem poles include welcome poles, mortuary poles, memorial poles, house poles, crest poles and shame poles.

Though many Native cultures are grounded in oral tradition, the totem pole is another means to document history.
